A NEW COVENANT FOR BY AND OF THE PEOPLE

Warren G. Harding has spoken:

And it would be well that all people read his words, he has issued a new declaration of independence, a new American covenant for the American people. In it is contained the best thought of the founders of the nation supplemented with the best that a long line of munificent statesmen have left as a heritage to the republic.

The address on the repudiation of annexing accepting the charge as candidate for the presidency, delivered this afternoon, is a direct statement to the people. It is to the point. Superlatives are omitted; it is a simple promise that under a republican administration Americanism will prevail, it is sure and will predominate throughout the world.

II

Senator Harding, in the very beginning, accepts the challenge to make the League of Nations the outstanding issue of the campaign, to make the referendum a referendum on the question. His remarks on the League of Nations are prefaced by the declaration that no one man is big enough to run this great republic. "There never has been one big enough," he says, "and such domination was never intended." The representative government founded by the fathers of the country, he says, has been sacrificed during the last eighty years and continues. "Our first continental is the restoration of popular and representative government; under the constitution, through the agency of the republican party. Our vision includes more than a chief executive, we believe in a cabinet of highest capacity, equal to the responsibilities which our system contemplates, in whose councils the vice-president, second official of the republic, shall be asked to participate. The same vision includes a cordial understanding and coordinated activities with a house of congress, fresh from the people, voicing the convictions which members bring direct from the electorate, and cordial co-operation along with the restored functions of the senate, fit to be the greatest deliberative body in the world. Its members are the designated sentinels on the towers of constitutional government. The resumption of the senate's authority saved to this republic its independent nationality, when autocracy misinterpreted the dream of a world experiment to be the vision of a world ideal."

Regarding a world association of nations, he says: "I can speak unreservedly for the American aspiration and the republican commitment for an association of nations, cooperating in sublime accord to attain and preserve peace through justice rather than force, determined bound to security through international law, so eliminated that no misconception can be possible without affronting world honor." The present League of Nations, he declares, was conceived for world super-government, negotiated in misunderstanding and infidely urged and demanded by its administration sponsors, who resisted every effort to safeguard America, and who finally rejected when such safeguards were inserted.

III

Senator Harding makes a plea for greater production in the country and for healthful competition in industry. We have now, he says, a minimum of production when we need a maximum. His views on labor are contained in the following statement: "War always establishes its higher standard of wages, and they abide. I wish the higher wage to abide, on one explicit condition—that the wage earner will give full return for the wage received. It is the best assurance we can have for a reduced cost of living. Mark you, I am ready to acclaimed the highest standard of pay, but I would be blind to the responsibilities that mark this fateful hour if I did not caution the wage earners of America that mounting wages and decreased production can lead only to industrial and economic ruin." Railroad employees, Senator Harding declared, ought to be the highest paid in the world, and adds that the government should cooperate with the railroad owners in rehabilitating transportation service. The present condition of the railroads, he says—the inadequacy of trackage and terminal facilities, the insufficiency of equipment and insufficiency of operation—all bear the blighting stamp of governmental incapacity during the federal operation.

IV.

Regarding the cost of living, Senator Harding says it is far too serious to dismiss with fluming but futile promises. He says: "Eight years ago, in time of peace, the democratic party made it an issue and when clothed with power that party came near to its accomplishment by destroying the people's capacity to buy. But that was a cure worse than the ailment. It is easy to understand its real causes, after which the patient must help to effect his own cure. Gross expansion of currency and credit have depreciated the dollar just as expansion and inflation have discredited the coins of the world. We inflated in haste, we must deflate in deliberation. We debased the dollar in reckless finance, we must restore it honestly. Deflation on the one hand and restoration of the 100-cent dollar on the other ought to have begun on the day after the armistice, but plaus were lacking as courage failed. The unpreparedness for peace was a little less costly than the unpreparedness for war. We can promise no one remedy which will cure an ill of such wide proportions, but we do pledge that earnest and consistent attack which the party platform covenants.

The speaker calls on the people for thrift and economy, promises the prevention of unreasonable profits and challenges profiteering. He advocates a system of collective bargaining for farmers. He reiterates his belief in a federal budget system and advocates the sending back to productive employment thousands of employees in federal departments who are either duplicating the work of another employee or are doing nothing at all. He advocates a great merchant marine and a navy ample to protect it.

The republican candidate straddles no issue. He has stated his belief and his remedies in the cases of the pressing political problems of the day. Anybody in America who reads the speech delivered this afternoon can know what Warren G. Harding stands for and what he stands against. He has spoken.
